

Twittering the Dead: Advice From Oracles

Contributed by Oracles et Inquisitors

Without dying, the closest anyone will ever get to death is life. Life is the first and most important step towards not-life. Too much time has been devoted to learning what's waiting at the end of this corporeal period. Instead, we've reached out to those at the end of the road for guidance in the what about here and how about now of our days. These, our mother poets, birthed us with their songs and even now they have little time, much more work to do. Brilliance in brevity, in walking heavy, packing light: we twitter and they twitter back. This is the digital age for us all.

Poets, with their subversive temperament and low tolerance for the mundane, don't believe questions need answers. Answers are uncertain absolutes, shaky verbs demanding to be nouns. The Inquisitors have stuck their fingers into the Poet Oracles' afterlife pie. Many pointers, the old printer's friend, were lost searching for good-boy plums, many fresh cherries popped scalding those nearby. Poet Oracles say what they mean to say with the words like breadcrumbs they left behind. Insatiably we set out to devour, to leave no morsel or way back (carb-free=zero guilt).

Gods have been known to tear out one of their eyes for wisdom. Here the pupil has reached into the warm face of a poem and torn out the line. Though the body is dead, the head survives. We are the furthest from death in the breath/breadth of poetry. Life is not the end; and even if it were we'd burn it into a new bird, a brighter only child.

(Some of these poets are at a very much alive stage of Oraclehood. This is fine, of course. An American like Steven Spielberg can be knighted by the Queen of England. A poet like Mark Doty need not be a ghost to give wisdom.)
